LETTER FROM

Dear Readers,

My magazine, the Zom-B Apocalypse, has a goal to warn the world about the apocalypse. It is most unfortunate that the earth was introduced to this terrifying epidemic disaster, but we must make do with what we're given. Sadly, there is no way to avoid a zombie invasion, and people must prepare for it if they want to survive. That is, prepare if it hasn't already reached you, in which case, you are probably dead. In my magazine, you will be informed of several ways to detain zombies, stop the decaying process, and strains of the zombie virus. However, I cannot guarantee that you will live through this pathogen. Reading this magazine will simply raise your chances of existing longer than most. Remember, no one is immortal, and you'll probably end up dying somehow.

One of my personal goals is to make the subject of learning to defend oneself more popular. You see, if everyone wants to learn how to protect themselves from zombies, someone who actually does know how might teach them and humanity will have a chance to survive. However, if no one wants to learn how, and no one wants to teach people who don't want to learn, then the human race will fall to the virus and perish. Another one of my goals is to tell the world about people who have survived being bitten by a zombie, and give them hope to live through this awful war against zombies. Also, I would like to make people understand that this is indeed a war against the zombie pathogen, and we need scientists to research more ways to reverse the effects of being bitten by a zombie. Hopefully, I will be able to achieve and expand upon my goals, so humanity can endure through another age. I have decided to name this age the Revenge of the Mindless Seekers, because zombies have no brains, which is why they eat humans' minds. Good luck keeping your head! Better luck to you if you continue reading my magazine.

Something that I encountered in writing this magazine was badgering people about getting something done, which was frustrating. Some people just need to get their priorities straight. What's more important, saving people's lives by selling an article or taking a nap? However, there were some people I have encountered who have done an amazing job writing my magazine. Those people are Emily Pappin, Haley Graves, Claudia Tausel, Danielle Drum, Kaitlyn Schlueter, Brooke Pernsteiner, and Emily Woodzicka.

Something that I struggled with in my magazine is being sick for six days and having to catch up with the people writing for me. One of my successes was being able to get back on track with my magazine, which was surprisingly much easier than I had thought it would be.

Another thing I struggled with was that I seem to have misplaced some of my money. I have absolutely no idea how I managed to lose one thousand dollars, as I highly doubt that it grew legs and walked away, but it truly is a mystery to me how I ended up missing. Ah, my wonderful luck.

Some of the best items written for me were "Nonviolent Ways to Stop Zombies from Killing You," by Haley Graves, and "Animal Zombies," by Claudia Tausel. In the article "Zombie Animals," I was surprised to learn that all zombie animals have six-toed paws, and that the most common zombie animal was the ostrich. I suppose you do learn something every day. As for Haley Grave's article, I was pleasantly surprised to find that the humor and voice were outstanding. And I must give credit to all others that I haven't mentioned in my letter, because everyone who wrote for me did a fantastic job. In the meantime, lock your doors, bar your windows, keep

Thank you everyone!

Apocalypse*

Dear Editor:

In your last magazine I read the article on “How to Catch a Zombie” was the best thing I have ever read in a long time. It never occurred to me that you could catch a zombie. I used to think about what to do if we had a zombie invasion, and now that I know how to catch a zombie but now I know just what to do. I also used to fear getting eaten by one, but not anymore! Thank you so much for publishing that article. It really saved my life!

Sincerely,

Alana Jennerjohn

Dear Editor:

The zombie kittens that you featured in your last issue of Zom-B Apocalypse were surprisingly cute and were the best pet I have ever had. However, I wish mine had lived longer; it died after a week of owning him. It was extremely sad. My zombie kitten was a strange one; it always tried to eat things, including other animals. I guess since it is a zombie that can be expected. Other than that, it acted like a perfect kitten and was obedient, lovable, and trained. I would recommend these kitten if you have a strange love for zombies and need excitement.

Sincerely,

How to Survive the Zombie Apocalypse

By: Danielle Drum

If you want to survive the zombie apocalypse, well good luck. Most of you will probably die within the first day or two. But if you follow these tips, you may live past the first week! However, I can't guarantee anything.

First, you will need to identify the zombies. There will be the kind that are super slow and stumble around stupidly, ones that will slowly walk after you but no matter how fast you run they're always right behind you, and the kind that are vicious and fast that will catch you and eat your brains. Pray for the slow and stupid ones; they're easiest to outrun and are actually possible to kill.

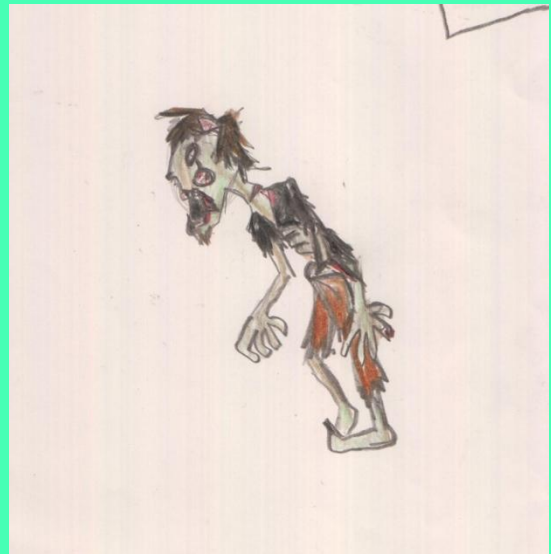

When you are fleeing to find someplace to hide in the middle of nowhere, remember to stay clear of water. Most zombies either come from the ground or water, so avoid water at all costs unless you are in a boat. When you are finding a place to hide, keep in mind you may have to stay there the rest of your life, so bring food and make sure its comfy and a little homey, but always stay on guard.

A good hiding place will be in the wilderness nowhere near any kind of civilization. Make sure there are trees so big one does find you, you can have a backup plan and hide in the tree. Zombies have bad memories, so it'll probably forget you in the tree and leave. They also have a short attention span and will chase anything that moves.

When you are running away from a zombie, you will need to defend yourself if you know you can't out run it. Weapons are highly advised. You never know when some will come in handy. Knives, machetes, rocks, pipes, and flame throwers are the best way for a zombie to lose a limb. A steam roller will work quite well also. You always have to carry pineapples around with you, because zombies love pineapples even more than brains.

If you follow these simple tips you may live a while more than expected. But again, there's no guarantee. You all know you are probably going to die, but before you die, why not live a little?

Mutation of the Zombie Pathogen

By: Emily Pappin

During what may become the Zombie Apocalypse, it is important to speculate about what may happen in the future and what humanity should prepare for. We never know what may happen to this mysterious pathogen, so considering all possibilities is a must.

Something that is important for scientists to consider is the possibility of mutation. Next to nothing is known about this pathogen, so nothing is known about how it will mutate. I say will because in the common diseases we see the virus or bacterium mutate in order to survive what antibiotics are thrown at them. The most well-known example of this is the case of the common cold. While not a threatening illness, the cold mutates so often that a cure or an antibiotic can't be manufactured.

How this disease spreads is also a mystery. A bite carries it obviously, but is that the only way? With the mutation, the way the disease is contracted may also change. A touch or a scratch may start to carry the substance needed for the disease to live in. A possibility is that the virus may mutate in order to survive and become airborne or contaminate the water supplies of makeshift communities.

Simple zombies are almost everywhere. These are the creatures that stay where they are without moving, sometimes for years if they are in the middle of nowhere, and only seem to move if it is necessary or if they smell what they consider food. These creatures are simple to avoid, and relatively easy to dispatch if needed.

When the virus mutates, it may create different kinds of zombies. They could be more intelligent and start to hunt in large packs in order to overpower the victim. They could learn how to open doors in order to get inside buildings that were once safe.

The pathogen could make them stronger, so they may breach barriers that were strong enough for simple zombies, but are no longer sufficient. It would be easier for zombies to overpower groups of people with fewer of their numbers.

Zombies may eventually regain some of their motor skills and start running or becoming more coordinated. They may figure out how to do other simple things like use locks or use the environment to their advantage. This change seems unlikely, though, as the disease severely damages the brain.

The disease may also affect the zombies' bodies in other physical ways. Their attributes such as hands and fingers could change in order to improve hunting skills. Their legs could elongate in order to move faster. We never know what may happen due to this virus.

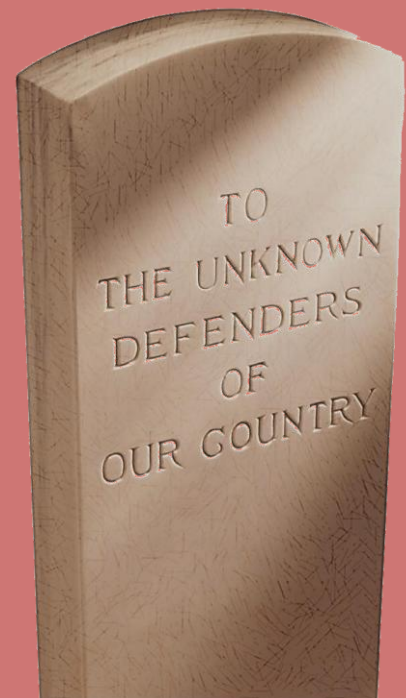

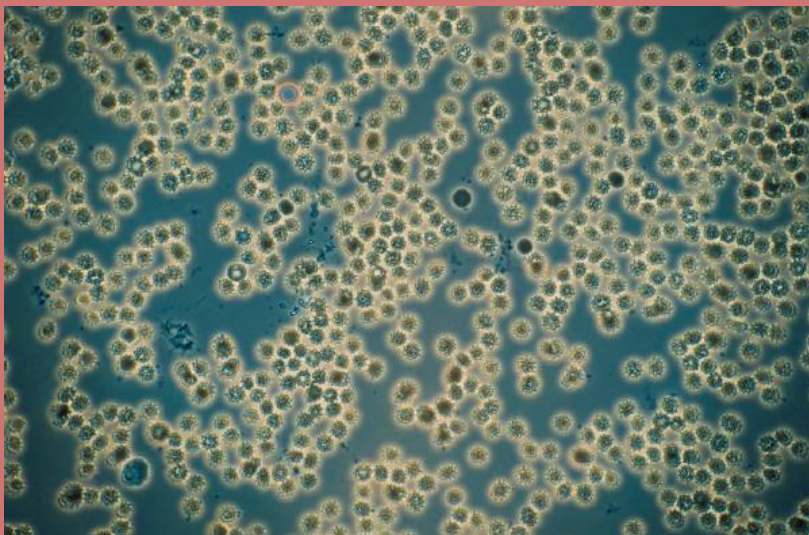

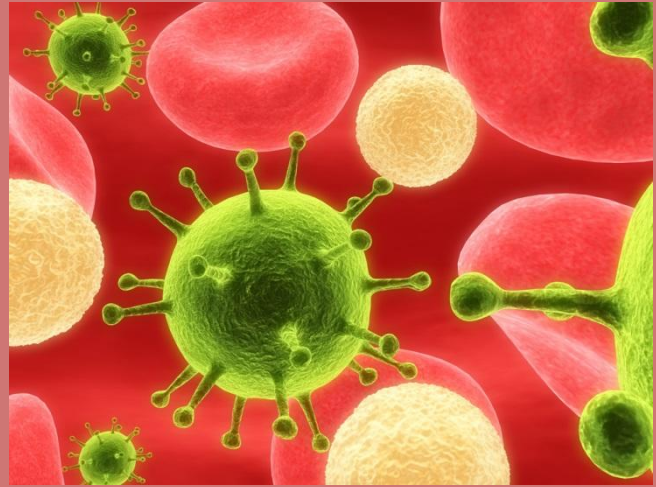

One thing that could potentially be a good thing the disease could cause is an accelerated rate of decay. This means that there would still be zombies around, at least until their tendons and muscles rot. The decay could cause the zombies to literally fall apart in a shorter amount of time. On the opposite side of the spectrum, they could start to decay slower and stick around much longer than expected.

Something disastrous that could also happen is the animals of the world becoming susceptible to the same virus as humans. You would have to constantly watch out for silent animals sneaking up on you. In the night there would be nocturnal animals out that are built to be able to hunt when it is dark out.

Even insects and bugs may become diseased, in which case there would be little hope. They can slip into our houses even now, and are little more than nuisances. Imagine having to watch out for these small creatures all day every day! Fortunately, it seems likely that the disease would tear the small animals and bugs apart from the inside out. They simply probably would not be able to handle the disease inside them.

In one more scenario that is highly unlikely, yet still possible, is the strain mutating to affect plant life. The plants would not necessarily exhibit the classic signs of being a zombie, but would be in the state of dead but not dead. They may leech nutrients from the plants and life around them, instead of just from the dirt around their roots. If it is a plant that other animals and people depend on for food, it would probably either be rotten from the plant leeching nutrients from it, or it would not be there due to stunted growth from the disease. If the food was still there, it probably would not be safe to eat because it may carry the disease. Again, it is highly unlikely for this to happen because the plant would probably just die, but considering all possibilities is important. Some of the scenarios mentioned in this article may seem far-fetched or extremely unlikely, but nothing is impossible and no possibility should be counted out.

Zombie Animals

By Claudia Tausel

Most people do not know that animals can be zombies too. The reason that many people don't know this is because zombie animals keep themselves hidden.

The most common zombie animal is the ostrich. This may sound odd, but there is a logical explanation. When ostriches die, most other animals do not attempt to eat them, unlike birds, squirrels, and skunks, which are commonly devoured within days by other animals of prey.

It is pretty obvious that human zombies cause apocalypses, but what do animal zombies do? They don't eat humans, but they do like to consume other animals. Animal zombies are not near a vicious as human zombies. They subconsciously know what kind of animals to eat in order to not wipe out the population. Again, animal zombies do not like to make themselves known to the world, so they have strict "rules" to follow.

One way of camouflage is their looks. Animal zombies, otherwise known as Animbies, look very similar to regular animals. The one thing that sets them apart is their dark black eyes. They will refuse to make eye contact because of this. Animbies do not have to blink, because there is a thin layer of water constantly coating their eyes.

Another distinct feature of Animbies is their feet. It doesn't matter if they had hooves or paws during their life, Animbies always have six-toed paws. The sixth claw is always longer than the rest, by at least an inch. This is another detail that is easy to miss because their paws are covered in a soft layer of fur, feathers, scales, or whatever accords to the type of skin that animal has. One exception to the paw rule is snakes. Instead of deformed paws, they have red scales speckled throughout their bodies.

One last thing about Animbies is their incredible sense of smell. They can detect a human from up to fifteen miles away. The bizarre thing is, this only works with humans. Again, they will do anything they can to stay away from people. If you want to find out more about Animbies, log on to www.animbiesblogspot.com.

Zombie Has a Change of Heart

By: Kaitlyn Schlueter

Zombie Tries to Drown Human

On June 21, 2020, Tuesday in Blueberry Park in Blueberryville Wisconsin, something unusual happened; a zombie saved a human from itself. The zombie was said to be drowning a man in a river. He had a sudden change of heart to become a better person and save the human from himself.

No! Don't Do It!

When the zombie was drowning the human man he had many thoughts running through his head. He definitely was not thinking about stopping what he was doing, as he took pride in being the best zombie. Many bystanders were shouting at him from all directions to stop hurting the man. Eventually, something they said got through to him because he ceased drowning the man. He then turned himself into authorities. The victim of his once aggressive nature survived the attack and is in the hospital recovering from minor injuries.

After the zombie turned himself into the authorities, they decided to use him as a secret weapon to fight off other zombie attacks that may happen in the future. In other words, this zombie got off easy, all for having a simple change of heart. Other zombies might hear about his story and experience the same emotional change as he did. If the world was filled with nice, loving zombies that cared about the lives of humans, people might actually become friends with them!

An innocent student by the name of Pete Henniker witnessed the whole scene, and reported seeing a zombie try to drown a man in a river. He claims that the man fought back bravely. He expresses his opinion very strongly, stating, "I never thought that a zombie could have such a great change of mind. It truly is remarkable that something this amazing could happen." After interviewing many other people about this dire situation, reporters find that not many people actually witnessed the tragedy. However, another bystander, Mr. Bauser, a teacher at Blueberryville High School commented, "What would our world be like if we had kind zombies that roamed there earth as our best friends and were loyal to us?"

History of Zombie Attacks

Zombies rarely attack humans, but human attacks are extremely common. Usually zombies go after wild animals that wander in the forests of Minnesota. When zombies are driven to small villages or towns with few forests they are forced to attack humans or domestic animals. There have been roughly fifty attacks on humans in the past two years. However, zombie attacks are becoming more and more frequent. Something needs to be done about this situation. The number of zombies is multiplying rapidly, and has been for the last few years. People need to do something before the problem becomes more serious and dire than it should be.

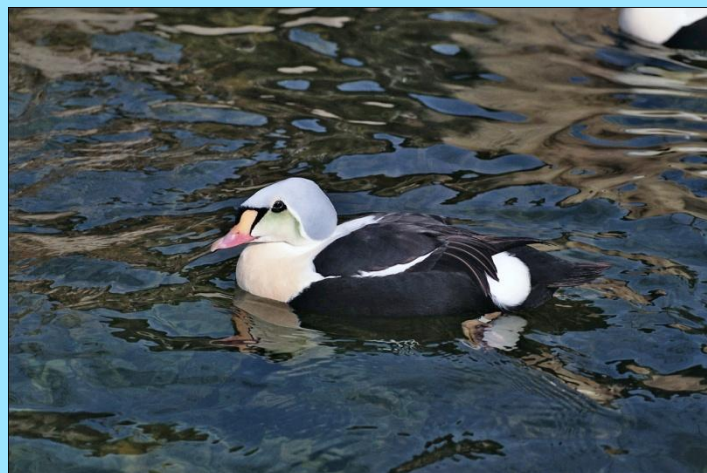

New Group of Zombie Hunters

Over the past months, Zombie Defeaters, an association that is dedicated to defending humans against the harm of zombies, as been working to decrease the zombie population. Although the number or members in this group is small, they are slowly working on increasing the number of people that work in this organization. However, it is not funded by the government, though they are petitioning to be funded. As that hasn't happened yet, the association only hires volunteers that are willing to work long hours for the good of humanity.

Tips on How to Prevent a Zombie Attack

- ~ Shower every day
- ~Wear large amounts of perfume or after-shave
- ~Sing off-key constantly
- ~Tie your shoe laces together
- ~Avoid evil ducks
- ~Wear shiny items

The Zombie Consideration

By: Brooke Pernsteiner

I always was whole heartedly convinced that zombies were terrifying, disgusting, loathsome creatures that do not feel, care, live, die, or do anything really other than eat human brains, till the day I went to Westar Park Island Warehouse. What you might ask changed my mind, and have I gone mad? Of course zombies are horrifying terrible creatures you might say, but in my experience certain zombies may not be evil, in fact some are kind.

My visit to Westar Park Island was a matter of necessity; my small encampment of survivors from the original zombie wave was running low on supplies, mainly food. My survival group, based in Grimauld forest, consisted of seventy people who all needed to be fed each day. The supplies were down we were having trouble maintaining that staple. Not good. So I, being the smart but ageing leader, gathered my three "best" people to join me on a mission outside the compound: Arnold Smith and Mickey Milliner, the two big, strong, tall guys who carried the zombie repelling devices and Esmeralda Wilder, the fast, dark-haired message-carrying girl, and myself. Antoinette Williams leader of the compound. We were a team I hoped could avoid the zombies long enough to grab some supplies.

We set out early to journey to the island. We were headed there because Westar Park had once been home to the biggest canned food warehouse I've ever laid eyes on. It was still half-full of cans containing pears, carrots, corn, beans, and other assorted fruits and vegetables. Now it was only an abandoned wreck full of food. The journey to the figurative paradise was only an hour long by truck, but the impatient and rather annoying Esmeralda complained every millisecond of the way.

"Hurry up," she said to Mickey who was driving. "Do you want them to catch us?" she blustered, "We'll never make it without them noticing. We are so in trouble."

Really she was just far too impetuous to wait an hour for anything. I sat in relative silence seething and beginning to wonder why I brought the senseless girl the first place until we rolled over the rickety metal bridge crossing the channel and pulled up under the warehouse's dingy overhang.

The whole place was really was in a state of disrepair; especially on the inside. It smelled of mildew and fungus with sweet tinges of decay. Heaps and mounds of crates, boxes, and barrels lined the walls. The only light came from a hole in the ceiling near the entrance where the flat metal roof had caved in creating an unintentional skylight.

"Alright," I whispered hurriedly. "Let's split up and each head to a different section. All of you grab as much food as you can cram in those big backpacks of yours."

We all spread out in opposite directions with me taking the corner farthest to the right. A decision I would soon regret.

Farther away from the skylight, it got very shadowy. Pitch black, actually. I pulled out my fat yellow flashlight and aimed the beam of light on the nearby crates labels: pears, peaches, pineapples. I was in the canned fruit section. Better than the vegetable section, if you ask me. I knelt down and pulled out my hammer and started ripping nails out of a crumbling pear crate. It was hard work and after fifteen minutes I had only had the nails out. Then, I heard a noise. Not a nice noise. No, it couldn't be the sound of an ice cream truck or classical music, but it was, a clomping sound, scrape, thunk, scrape, thunk. It was a sound that I had come to know well. The zombies were here.

I quickly stood up, the rusty nails dropping from my hand. I turned to run as a zombie rounded the corner, but found my way blocked by two more zombies. I stifled a scream, determined to escape. I wiggled into the tiny space between to crates and hid; for once glad I was so short and skinny. I was convinced that at any moment I would see the decaying hand of one of the horrors reaching for me. But instead, I heard the sound of a crate door ripping off, and dozens of cans of pineapple falling to the floor. Then I heard the clink of cans being stacked. Suddenly, the sound was everywhere echoing many times across the warehouses vast interior. All the zombies had begun stacking cans. I could hear Esmeralda's shrill voice questioning what was happening from across the warehouse. As the crates near her were emptied and then stacked. Meanwhile, I slipped out of my hiding place laughing at the pure irony, and was almost hit by a semi-truck driving very, very slowly across the ground. The truck swerved around to a stop, and a zombie fell out the door. It turned toward me, groaned, and extended its hand towards me, then walked past and proceeded to try and load the truck full of food. All the zombies came forward to assist. I followed the crowd of zombies around the truck back to the entrance where the old wheezing truck barely made it across the bump. I ran into poor Mickey and Arnold who both looked like kittens scared up a telephone pole. The two of them were sitting atop a box of crates high above the floor. Esmeralda, being quite vivacious and impulsive, had climbed into the front seat of the truck.

"Come on," she called, "they loaded the truck for us."

I didn't want my authority challenged by that girl so I climbed in the truck and pushed her over to the other seat and yelled for Mickey and Arnold to get over here.

The second they were in I hit the gas and didn't let up until we had sped away from the warehouse and crossed the bridge. No one spoke for a half hour until Arnold asked the question everyone was wondering.

"Why didn't they eat us?"

"Yeah, why?" Esmeralda asked. "I mean they actually kind of helped us. They normally don't do that."

I had been pondering that question since we left and I hadn't been able to piece it together. But, given a chance to show my intellect is rare opportunity so I took my best guess.

"Well, I think it was the pineapple. Zombies prefer pineapple over brains, so I think it actually makes them seem more human and—" I said slowly.

"Or," Esmeralda interrupted, "they might just have been nice zombies."

At the time I thought the idea ridiculous, but then I thought they were hiding in warehouse, maybe even from other zombies, and they did help us. What if they were kind?

Epic Brain Recipe

By Jacob Ahles

INGREDIENTS:

- 1 - brain
- 1 cup- spit
- ¼ cup- ground gravel
- 2 cups- worms of your choice
- 1 cup- motor oil
- 1 cup- melted rubber
- 2 - 8oz can of spam
- 1- 3/8 inch wrench
- ½ cup- candy of your choice

First, preheat your oven to 350°F. Then, take the brain and slice it lengthwise into about ½ inch slices. Place the slices in a large pan over a layer of worms. Next, melt the rubber and add the spit and spam. Let this sit for 7 minutes at a low simmer. Pour this mixture over the brain and place the wrench and candy on top. Finally, put the pan in the oven for 25 to 30 minutes. Once out of the oven, drizzle the oil and sprinkle the gravel generously over the finished dish. Serve with bloody fingers (page 25 of Monsterbook of Recipes)

Nonviolent Ways to Stop Zombies from Killing You

By Haley Graves

Since the apocalypse is slowly approaching us, much like some zombies slowly lurch towards you to eat your brains, I thought that I would give you my best tips to prevent a zombie from eating your brains. That is, assuming that you do have brains to begin with. Even the most brainless or the most foolish people can perform these failsafe ways to prevent zombies from killing you.

The first way to prevent zombies from killing you is fairly simple, and very obvious. This tip is more of a way to buy you time in a zombie attack than a way to stop the zombies, but regardless, it works. Most of you will probably think that this is common sense but for those of you who lack such skills: listen to your brain when it is screaming at you, "RUN!" This will not always help you though, seeing as there are a few different types of zombies which can run very fast compared to your slow, stereotypical, zombie. And, there's also that chance that you are a slow runner, are physically unfit, get winded easily, or you cannot run for long distances. In that case, you will have to use another tip.

The second tip should also be easily accomplished if you have unlimited access to fresh produce, but hardly any people know about this. A zombie's biggest weakness is a pineapple. You see, the skin of a pineapple has a certain fiber in it that not many people know about. This fiber is called Z Priontin. You may think this to be a silly tip or that this will not work, but I kid you not, if you have a pineapple with you when you meet a zombie it will eat the pineapple and forget about you, allowing time to flee. Now that you all know that a zombie's weakness is pineapple it may be harder to perform this trick, what with everyone stocking up on their pineapples for the coming apocalypse.

This next way is a slightly harder trick to accomplish. To perform this trick you will first need to obtain one of the many ancient Art of War against Zombies books. This should be fairly easy to find, seeing as there are many copies of this book and you can probably pick up a copy of this book in your local bookstore. The next part is slightly trickier. You will need to obtain a whole teaspoon full of Pixie Dust; you should probably have extra in case there are more than two or three zombies. You will need to find the incantation: abeo, converte and recite it over the Pixie Dust, then you will need to throw the Dust at the zombies. To perform this trick correctly you must be sure that you use the correct pronunciation given in the book or the incantation will backfire and you will be permanently frozen and the zombies will have a better chance at eating your brains. The Pixie Dust will slow down the zombies and the decaying process.

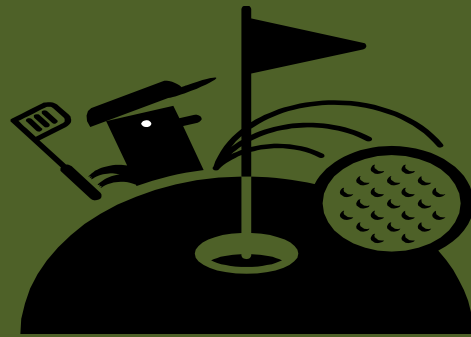

In the case that you have not listened to any of the previously listed tips and you have gotten yourself bitten by a zombie, then all you will need to do is sprinkle the Pixie Dust over the part of your body that has been contaminated. The Pixie Dust does not only slow down the decaying process in zombies, it will also help to slow down the decaying process if you have been bitten. If you notice the process beginning to speed up again, then all you need to do is apply more of the Pixie Dust! This will allow you with enough time to get to a doctor; they will be able to reverse the affects.

The final way to prevent zombies from killing you is a special key, known as a Sidrat key. This is by far the most difficult way to prevent zombies from killing you. Not only is the key very difficult to find, but there are only sixty-eight keys known to be in existence. The purpose of this key was once to unlock the Sidrat chest, each member had their own key. The Sidrat were an ancient religious group in the northern parts of Africa. They believed that these ancient mummies had come to life, when all reality it had just been an outbreak of zombies. The ancient Sidrat believed that the magic inside of the chest would be transferred into their keys. They would all hold the keys up at once and the zombies, who were obviously confused or just stricken by the magic inside of the key, just stood there, paralyzed. The ancient Sidrat people were ecstatic to find that this had worked and watched as their ancient mummies stumbled back toward their graves.

Exploding Pink Pixie Dust Golf Balls

By: Cody Lohrenz

These golf balls are extremely helpful to me! Before the zombies I used to be a professional golfer and had no proper training against zombie threats. I began to panic once the outbreak had occurred but now I've got nothing to worry about thanks to this new invention. Now I can still golf while combating the zombie threat. I don't know where I would be if it wasn't for the Exploding Pink Pixie Dust Golf Balls. The vibrant pink explosion of the golf balls is stunning and unbelievably with each hit I take. I have found absolutely no problems once so ever and I would strongly recommend buying these golf balls.

Radioactive Zombies

By: Michelle Edwards

In an unfortunate accident with a nuclear power-plant, there seems to be a slight problem with radioactive zombies.

Two dozen zombies stumbled into a nuclear power-plant in Ohw, Rotcod last Wednesday, and turned all the people inside to zombies. Without the humans to maintain and upkeep the plant, there was a nuclear meltdown, and before anyone could relocate the zombies, they fled the scene.

Like humans, zombies are able to mutate when exposed to extreme radiation. They can grow extra limbs, become faster and stronger, spread radiation, and infect other zombies. Experts have estimated the original number of radioactive zombies to be about five hundred, which all scattered after the meltdown. These zombies are now transferring their mutated zombie virus to humans and other zombies. Reports of entire towns being lost to this terrible new disease have been noted. Experts now estimate the number of radioactive zombies, after the originals began to disperse and infect, is at an astonishing 17,500.

These zombies seem to have a specific way of mutating, as scientists have discovered after successfully capturing one.

First, the zombie will begin to glow green. Then, it will begin to develop new limbs. Seven is the most that the zombie will have once done mutating. Next, the zombie will double, if not triple in size. Then, the zombie will no longer crave pineapples more than human brains, and those who have stock-piled pineapples will be defenseless. Lastly, the massive zombie will begin to develop a heightened sense of smell, where it is able to locate a human from forty miles away. The zombie is finally done mutating and its main priority in life will be to eat as many human brains as it can. Also, it can transmit its mutations not only by eating a human's brain, but sneezing on a person. The mutation may take weeks, or months, or even years. It is extremely painful, according to scientists, and it is known that this new species of zombies can in fact feel pain, but their desperation for brains drives them to extraordinary lengths to get the brains it needs. The only weakness that has been found in this type of zombie is that if it is deprived of a human brain for six months, it will disintegrate into a slug, which is completely harmless to humanity.

As you may have noticed by now, these radioactive zombies are becoming something of a problem. Here are a few tips to avoid them;

- ☠ If you see a zombie that is glowing with a sickly green color, run as fast as you possibly can.
- ☠ If you find yourself surrounded by radioactive zombies, try not to breathe or touch them. Pretend to be a zombie yourself.
- ☠ If a radioactive zombie is chasing you, and is faster than you, do not climb a tree. You must find somewhere too small for the mutated creature to fit.
- ☠ DO NOT FIGHT IT!
- ☠ Do not chop off any limbs; it will grow a new one.

And that is all the advice there is to give. If you have any factual information about the zombies, or how to stop one, it would be greatly appreciated. Just email us at www.radioactivezombieapocalypse.com. Meanwhile, enjoy the regular zombies will you can, because what little government is left isn't sure how to battle this new threat to the Earth.
